Chapter 1 by Selena Raynee

Think about it: she could have easily changed her own fate and the fate of her world.

Imagine: she could have easily pushed that little swine to his death, when he was bragging about killing her father.

She would have been executed, you say? Probably, yet not necessarily.

But imagine what would have happened next, on the global scale.

Chapter 3 by Kellie Cook

Sansa rolled over once more, the struggle to find a comfortable position was near impossible.

Her dreams were plagued with memories of King's Landing, her time in the Vale, her sham of a marriage to Bolton. It was no wonder she was so sad.

sewn at Castle Black was even now beginning to pinch. She would have to procure some warm fabric and soon if she were to craft another garment before the real winter arrived.

Ramsay Bolton had physically hurt her each and every night she shared his bed, but nothing remotely disgusted her like his child growing in her belly.

Sansa dread the child would be an exact replica of his devil-born father and that she could not handle. She wished night after sleepless night that her mother or even Rob were here to counsel her on what to do. It wasn't too late to ingest penny royal. The right amount of the herb would insure there would be no child. The pain would be great, but then there would be no monster bearing the name of Stark born in the North, either.

She turned as a soft knock on the chamber door interrupted her thoughts.

"Yes?", her voice barely above a whisper.

"It's Jon. We need to talk."

"Come in and warm yourself by the fire. I'll sent for some ale."
